The creation of the Faculty of Human and Social Sciences (FSHS) testifies to the desire of the Euromed University of Fez to contribute to the training for the country and the African and Mediterranean region of high-level executives in the field of social development.

The needs in this area, it should be remembered, are immeasurable. Especially since today's world is caught in a dynamic of dizzying changes that affect all aspects of modern life. This explains the complexity that characterizes it, the uncertainty experienced by most societies both in the north and in the south of the planet in relation to their benchmarks and strategic visions.

To cope with this, the major universities around the world are making a special place in their training courses in the disciplines of the humanities and social sciences. Because these sectors, we know it even better today, are real laboratories where we train specialists who are able to control social changes, to foresee the risks, to measure the stakes, the dimensions and the consequences.

The great specificity of the FSHS is to have not only chosen to train in the mastery of these skills, but also to favor the acquisition of trades and know-how allowing its graduates to be actors of progress, contributors to the emergence of values of emancipation and creation of wealth.
